Letter from the publisher

A parent for always

Someone recently remarked to me that when they think of parents, they think of someone with little kids, not pre-teens, or teens, or young adults. I disagree. I think being a parent is for always, and in fact, gets more challenging and often more interesting as the years go by.

Sometimes there is role reversal and that's a part of it too. When one is very old the roles can shift and the caregiver of yesterday is the now the needy recipient of today's loving care. I've been thinking a lot about the economics of our time and the reemergence, often due to necessity, of the multi-generational houses; something more reminiscent of the 40's or 50's than more recent decades.

Society now experiences the dilemma of young people, fresh out of college, heavily loaded with student loan debt and no jobs to be had. Many are opting to live at home with parents rather than take on extra burdens of household overhead. Many have no choice. The jobs they trained for aren't hiring and the jobs they can get are not paying enough to support independent living.

Then there is the phenomenon of even older adults, mature aged men and women who have lost their jobs, homes and self-esteem, who are moving in with very aged and mature parents who probably thought their days of living with their kids were far behind them. It's a new phenomenon, or rather, an old one. Kids used to stay at home until they got married and even then, in many cultures, after being married, still went on living with other members of an extended family, maybe bachelor uncles, or unmarried aunts, and in-laws.

I grew up with a large extended family all living together. For me, it was normal, and mine was not the only house like that. There were many others. This was when marriage came earlier in the life cycle than it does now and was prior to the welcome liberation of women and women's rights to equal education and equal job opportunities, all of which has largely changed the landscape.

I'm happy my daughter is still at home living with me. There are times I'm not happy, but for the most part, I cherish the days she is still there close by for me to enjoy, observe, and experience. This morning, I went to her room to see if she was awake, and she looked just like the little girl she used to be. She yawned and that yawn was the same yawn that newborn baby had 20 years ago. We change, but we are always the same. We are always ourselves, and our children are always our children no matter how tall they get, or how powerful. The responsibility and joy is always there.

Thanks for reading. Happy New Year!

Seen and not heard?

Managing toddler etiquette in public

BY RISA C. DOHERTY

When my children were toddlers and elderly neighbors would greet us in the elevator, my son would confidently answer “hello” with a smile. My daughter was the one who would grab onto me before responding timidly. Granted, some children are more reserved, but I always thought it was important that my children knew how to interact socially at a young age. Little did I realize that the skills I was teaching them, starting at the age of 2, would be invaluable life tools.

Children often follow a parent’s lead. Savvy parents are aware of that, and as they greet neighbors, relatives or friends, they model this skill for uninitiated toddlers. Still, not all toddlers are willing to conform. When a child hesitates to greet someone she knows, I give more credit to the parent who tries desperately to goad the recalcitrant child into responding civilly than to the parent who cavalierly gives up and accepts the child’s refusal to respond, quickly dismissing the child’s silence with an excuse.

Once these children are old enough to walk around unaccompanied, they are often the ones who stare at you blankly when you greet them in passing, knowing full well who you are.

Lyudmila Bloch, international etiquette expert and author of “The Golden Rules of Etiquette at The Plaza,” is not accepting of parental apologies. She believes that toddlers should be capable of a civil greeting, despite their parents’ claims that the child is tired, in a bad mood, or painfully shy. She told me that it is a matter of “self-regulation,” and that even a very shy child can overcome his shyness.

She does not believe that it is ever the child’s fault for failing to respond to a greeting, stating that “the parents are 100 percent responsible for their child’s behavior: there are no ‘bad children.’”

Helayne Cohen, director of the Early Childhood Center at Temple Beth Sholom in Roslyn Heights, Long Island, holds a master’s degree in Early Childhood Leadership and Advocacy, and takes issue with the word “shy” to describe a 2 year old, questioning whether or not a 2 year old can actually be shy. She believes that it is “a matter of temperament” and that “sometimes the parents need to wait a little.” Still, she says she would encourage parents to model proper behavior for their child, be aware that “there is a readiness factor,” and work with a child, once he is ready.

“[Learning] proper manners starts at home,” she says. She agrees that teaching young children how to properly interact in social situations is an important and valuable life skill, and that even 2 year olds can learn to properly greet others. “[They] are so impressionable, [and can often learn this skill] if the directions are stated [simply], using a two word command.”

Restaurant manners

When my relatives came to New York with their young child, they were wary about heading into a restaurant, lest their active son disturb others. Unfortunately, this awareness and consideration for others is not shared by all parents. I assured my cousins that I would select a family-friendly venue, and my insightful cousin knew to bring small toys as a distraction for her son. It is important to know your child and know how long he can remain somewhat subdued in a public setting.

That is not to say that young children need to remain totally silent in public at all times. A friend of mine used to comment the moment a young child let out a yelp in public, as if the parents should have been incarcerated immediately for permitting any noise. That friend had long forgotten what it was like to be the parent of a young child.

Still, many diners can probably recall the not-unfamiliar sight of parents engrossed in adult conversation while their toddlers continue to scream at an unbelievably high decibel level. Some mothers seem so desperate to engage in adult conversation that they tune out their children, as they are tired of being interrupted, and crave adult socialization. At the same time, their children are desperately vying for their attention and creating an unpleasant dining experience for everyone else.

Both Bloch and Cohen stress the importance of preparing children for a restaurant experience. This may involve working with your child so that he is ready for the experience.

“[Young children] cannot share a public space if you did not teach them about [proper] behavior,” explains Bloch. She recommends doing a rehearsal at home, purchasing little utensils and seating your child at a small table where he can eat and rehearse good table manners. As the child progresses, he can practice at the big table with adults.

Bloch reminds parents to praise the child as he learns to hold and use each utensil properly and manage his cup and napkin. The teachers in Cohen's Early Childhood Center have the children practice using "restaurant voices" when they eat lunch at school. She tells me that a lot of positive modeling takes place in preschool, as well.

Bloch points out that the parent's physical proximity to the toddler in the restaurant is key and that preparedness includes providing diversions to keep your toddler "as busy as possible." Cohen advises parents to bring "an arsenal of stuff."

I, personally, always went to restaurants with a bag full of surprises, from a tabletop puppet stage with a wide array of puppets, to a small, snap-together train track, and a wind-up plastic train.

Of course, experts agree that if all else fails, and the child's behavior continues to be disruptive to other diners, then the parent needs to remove the child from the environment.

Shopping etiquette

Young children have always demanded instant gratification. Stores provide them with lots of stimulation, and they are often vocal about things they want. Many parents prefer not to disappoint their little darling by saying "no," so they appease their demands and rip open everything from Hot Wheels to Cheez Doodles, leaving food remnants and toy parts in their wake on the way to the register.

Not only does Bloch warn that opening merchandise before paying is modeling poor behavior, but these parents are depriving their children of some critical skills. These children are not learning any coping skills, nor understanding that they sometimes need to wait. According to Bloch, these children are used to getting whatever they want, and as they get older, it becomes problematic when their demands are not immediately satisfied.

Even near the register, impulse items beckon the youngest shoppers. Cohen advises parents that use the opportunity to teach their young children about choices, instead of acquiescing to every plea, perhaps even causing the parent to buy something she would not otherwise buy. She also believes that parents should enter stores armed with small treats and toys, in case their toddler gets hungry or bored.

Life skills

Bloch told me that the social skills needed to properly interact with others and navigate the world are "taught in incremental steps from [age] 2 to 22." Basic skills, including coping skills and patience, taught by creating boundaries for young children, will serve these children well throughout their lives.

"Once [they] know the rules, [they] develop confidence and self-esteem," she adds. We are, in essence, empowering them by acquainting them with basic social conventions and fostering the creation of essential interpersonal communication skills.

Parenting requires a certain amount of work. Bloch says "[it's] all about effort" and insisting on good behavior. Although some children need more attention and guidance than others, a minimum amount of effort is necessary to teach them how to interact in our world. It is a parent's job to prepare them for eventual adulthood, and teach them proper manners and social skills from the time they are young, as an investment in their future.

HEALTHY LIVING

DANIELLE SULLIVAN

Want some cereal with your sugar?

How much sugar does your child eat on a daily basis? Would you ever let her have dessert for her first meal of the day? You may be doing just that, if you feed her certain cereals.

We all know that popular kids' cereals can be loaded with sugar. The words "frosted," "maple," and "honey" often tend to masquerade for sugar, sugar, sugar. So, many of us buy cereals that contain oats and bran, but that doesn't necessarily guarantee a healthy breakfast.

In fact, according to the Environmental Working Group, a nonprofit research and advocacy organization, the amount of sugar in most cereals nearly assures that your child might be eating the equivalent of a sugary dessert each morning.

When children eat cereal for breakfast, many are getting considerably more sugar than the daily-recommended amount. The American Heart Association recommends that children consume less than three teaspoons of sugar per day — which is much less than what is found in some single servings of these cereals.

"I was really surprised when I read the EWG report," says Jean Sanderson, a mom of three from Chelsea in Manhattan. "I think I am being very careful when I shop, and I learned that two of the cereals that I regularly buy are on the list. Ironically, every time my kids ask for a box of cookies, I say no, but then let them eat cereal. Who knew?"

The worst offenders are Kellogg's Honey Smacks, Post Golden Crisp, and General Mills Wheaties Fuel. Each contains approximately 20 grams of sugar (five teaspoons). This amount is actually more than one Hostess Twinkie. In addition, three Chips Ahoy cookies (11 grams) have less sugar than one serving of Honey Nut Cheerios (12 grams).

However, there is no need for parents to stop buying cereal altogether, because many good-tasting cereals do meet federal guidelines for nutritional health. Among the top healthiest cereals are Kellogg's Mini-Wheats: Unfrosted Bite-Size, Frosted Big Bite, Frosted Bite-Size, Frosted Little Bite, General Mills Cheerios Original, and General Mills Kix Original.

Just remember, supermarkets know that kids will naturally gravitate toward the brightly colored sugary cereals, so they place those boxes on the lower shelves at just the right level to catch a child's eye. You just have to be one step ahead.

"Parents have to be investigative and make sure that what their kids are eating is of good value, because the companies and stores certainly aren't doing it," says Sanderson.

Helping children develop their self-esteem

Advice from a child psychiatrist

BY MARINA DOULOVA

Self-image is the single most important factor in the development of mentally healthy children. It also plays a large role in their achievements and interpersonal relationships.

While still very young, children's self-esteem depends on their perceptions of how they are being judged and valued by the adults who have importance in their lives. Contrary to popular belief, young children are unlikely to have their self-esteem grow stronger from excessive praise or flattery from adults; rather, it may raise some doubts in children and subsequently cause them to mistrust the person who is doing the praising.

Young children are more likely to benefit from tasks and activities that offer a real challenge, and earn them real appreciation, rather than fun activities that are rewarded with superficial praise.

To help children establish healthy self-esteem, one should treat children with respect, ask their views and opinions, and give them meaningful and realistic feedback. You can also help your child develop and maintain healthy self-esteem by helping to cope with defeats, rather than emphasizing constant successes.

As children grow older, they become increasingly sensitive to feedback from their peers. You can help your child maintain self-confidence during this difficult time by being supportive of his values, accepting him when others may not, and encouraging him to keep an open mind about experiences outside of his home.

A child can become vulnerable and unstable when he carries a psychiatric condition. Many mental illnesses influence low self-esteem formation, which is secondary to emotional disturbance. In such cases, it is important to treat the psychiatric symptoms first.

Treatment of primary mental conditions will help a child preserve a healthy self-image. Children with emotional disturbances need to be evaluated by mental health professionals specializing in child psychiatry. If a child is diagnosed with a mental condition, it is important to receive treatment, even if the condition may be of a temporary nature.

Early intervention is one of the most important keys to successful treatment and subsequent recovery.

Depending on the psychiatric issues and the child's personality, certain treatment methods provide better outcome than others. For example, different types of psychotherapy, such as supportive, interpersonal, and cognitive-behavioral, are used to help the child by not only talking, but also by helping him develop strategies to recognize his symptoms and how to deal with them in a social environment. Art and play therapy may be used by professionals in treating child psychiatric disorders. While complete remission may not be obtained, therapy will enable the child to boost his self-confidence and maintain a more fulfilling lifestyle.

For children with moderate to severe symptoms, offering medication treatment in combination with psychotherapy can be effective. However, receiving medication can also put a child at risk for lowering self-confidence due to the stigma associated with it. It can be prevented by a gentle approach and psycho-education offered by a child psychiatrist.

Preventative measures need to be taken in approaching a child struggling with self-esteem development. Early intervention, with the help of a mental health specialist in child psychiatry, is one of the most important keys to successful treatment and subsequent recovery. Just as it is important to treat diabetes, hypertension, and other health issues to prevent long-term health complications, it is also important to treat the kinds of mental conditions that will inhibit the development of sound self-esteem affecting that child for life.

Value of Catholic schools

Why parents choose this effective alternative

BY CANDI SPARKS

At a time when the New York City public school system is under so much criticism and revision, working families have found an alternative in the Catholic school system. These schools have historically been the ones to reach out to and support communities in need.

Years ago, hundreds of thousands of immigrants came to the New World to have a fresh start. They put in long hours at low-level jobs, striving for greater opportunity and a better life for their children. It was a financial sacrifice for these immigrants to send their children to Catholic schools, rather than through the public school system, but to them, it was well worth it.

The public schools in their working-class neighborhoods were largely overcrowded and not necessarily providing top-notch education. In order to be more assured that their children would be taught their values — including discipline, which was a rigorous part of their children's life at home — they decided to send their children through a parochial school system, even if it meant struggling to find the extra money to pay for it.

In the early days of the immigration wave, it was primarily Irish and Italian immigrants that sent their children to Catholic parochial schools. As the years went by and new immigrants came from more countries and continents, the demographic shifted and one didn't necessarily have to be Catholic to choose this educational option. As a result, many Catholic schools throughout the city have continued as an integral part of our citywide school landscape.

Currently, Catholic schools serve more than 160 nationalities. With each wave of immigration — Hispanic, Asian, Slavic and many others — Catholic schools offer diversity. These schools are not just racially diverse; there is also religious diversity in the Catholic school system. In fact, non-Catholics comprise about one quarter of the student body.

"Catholic schools are not just meant for the faithful. We are here to grow faith by building community and reaching out to those in need," says Tom O'Brien, of the Brooklyn Diocese, which is involved in raising scholarship funds to help families offset tuition. "But not every Catholic school family is in great economic need. Our demographic is changing. We have seen an influx of middle income families who choose Catholic school because of the class size, excellence in education, and for a safer environment than what most parents think the neighborhood public school would offer."

Patty, a public school teacher from the Bronx, sends her son Ronald to a Catholic elementary school.

"The environment stresses academics and doing the right thing," she says. "The teachers set high standards for the children. They are expected to do well and they rise to the occasion."

Many Catholic school students are the first ones in their families to graduate from college. In low-income neighborhoods, this means that the school is providing the lion's share of educational support for children who do not have access to private tutoring or help at home.

There is a 99 percent graduation rate for Catholic high schools, followed by a 97 percent college graduation rate for those who graduated Catholic high school. Compared to the 41 percent public high school graduation rate, Catholic school students have a better success rate. They are guided up the ladder of growth and achievement, making a real difference for present and future generations. Overall, Catholic school seems to outperform public school and is a viable, less-expensive system of education in the private sector.

In fact, the only two private schools in New York State that were designated by the U.S. Department of Education as Blue Ribbon — a program that honors public and private elementary, middle, and high schools whose students achieve at very high levels, or schools that make significant progress in closing the achievement gap — in 2011 were both Catholic schools in the Archdiocese of New York. The honorees were St. Ignatius Loyola School on E. 84th Street in Manhattan and St. Ignatius on Mott Street in Manhattan. This year's honorees show the excellence in education and the diverse population served by Catholic schools. The incentives for getting a Catholic school education are different than what they used to be, and this is changing the demographics of Catholic school students.

"Families that don't have money don't usually have many choices. We needed to find a school with the right mix for Benny. He really wanted to play baseball. The only school that we could find to bridge the gap was a Catholic school. We are all very happy with the switch," says Elizabeth, a Brooklyn mother of two, who chose to send her son to a Catholic school with solid academics and a baseball program.

Likewise, Patty, of East Harlem, sends her daughter Amber to a bilingual Catholic school.

"My daughter goes to a school that gives her [education] in both languages," says Patty. "Sure, they speak the same languages in the public school around the corner, but it is unofficial. The public school does not have the same structure." Amber's Catholic school is also closely related to other parish activities and offers bilingual masses, events and service projects for the community. This makes the Catholic school a great way for Patty and Amber to meet people of similar backgrounds and build a community. Parochial schools celebrate the tradition of faith, family and community.

Unfortunately, keeping these schools open has become a challenge. The Catholic school sector is no different than any other, and closings have been publicized. In response, Catholic schools are researching and developing new educational business models. Some Catholic schools have closed their doors, only to reopen as academies. For example, in South Ozone Park, the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary School and St. Stanislaus Bishop and Martyr School closed their doors, only to be succeeded by the Divine Mercy Catholic Academy. Because the school involves more than one parish, the school is called an academy to differentiate it from a single-parish school. Since 2005, the Brooklyn Diocese has opened many Catholic academies in Brooklyn and Queens.

The Brooklyn Diocese has also implemented the program "Preserving the Vision." The name means exactly what it says: preserving what has always been an integral part of Catholic life: the education of children. This vision includes developing schools that will be better able to meet the diverse and changing needs of students and parents, and providing competitive compensation and benefits to teachers and staff.

Even though two schools in the Archdiocese of New York have won the 2011 Blue Ribbon Award, the organization is still committed to improving. The Archdiocese has initiated the "Pathways to Excellence" program, aimed at professional development for principals, teachers and staff at schools that already do outstanding work. Because of the diverse population, there is still more than can be done to close the achievement gap. The program is aimed at raising standardized test scores and providing teachers with new classroom tools, such as the digital teaching program for fourth and fifth grade math, "Time to Know," which provides online learning, data collection and feedback for the school.

Personally, I am proud to share that my fondest childhood memories revolve around a humble beginning, in a humble neighborhood. My siblings and I attended a Catholic elementary school, Our Lady of Victory, for eight years. I am pleased that Catholic schools are committed to remaining vibrant institutions for generations to come.

Discover a 'Snowy Day' in a museum

illustrator Ezra Jack Keats is on display at the Jewish Museum

BY LAURA VAROSCAK-
DEINNOCENTIIS

Now that the holidays are over, and the streets of Manhattan are less congested, there is no excuse to miss "The Snowy Day and the Art of Ezra Jack Keats," which runs through Jan. 29 at the Jewish Museum. The exhibition celebrates the 50th anniversary of Keats' beloved Caldecott Medal-winner, "The Snowy Day," and pays tribute to a pioneer in children's literature.

Curated by Claudia Nahson, the show highlights the iconic picture book and features more than 80 original works by the artist. Visitors will enjoy viewing Keats' preliminary sketches, storyboards and dummy books, as well as final illustrations and paintings. Letters and photographs also provide insight into Keats' life and art. Before the end of the exhibit, readers — young and old — can settle down in a Keats-inspired urban landscape and browse through his many books.

Jacob "Jack" Ezra Katz was born in Brooklyn in 1916. His parents, Eastern European Jewish immigrants, were poor, and the family lived in an East New York tenement for most of Keats' childhood. Exposed to poverty and anti-Semitism, Keats developed an early sympathy for others suffering from deprivation and prejudice. He understood what it felt like to be an outsider, and this social isolation became a common theme in his work. As a young boy, he used art as a means of escape and learned that his talent could help him overcome obstacles in life.

Primarily self-taught, Keats spent his early years drawing and painting. He doodled at home, and his mother supported his artistic talent. His father discouraged it. It wasn't until Keats sold a painted sign to a store for 25 cents that his father accepted that his son might make a living doing what he loved.

During the 1930s, Keats worked as a comic book artist and a mural painter for the Works Progress Administration. While serving in World War II, he reacted to anti-Semitism by legally changing his name to Ezra Jack Keats. He spent a brief, but productive, period studying painting in Paris in 1949, and in the next decade, worked as an illustrator for several publications including Reader's Digest, the New York Times Book Review and Colliers.

Keats co-authored his first book, "My Dog is Lost," in 1960. This story features a youngster named Juanito who searches for his lost dog in the streets of New York. In his memoirs, Keats mentions a 9-year-old Puerto Rican boy who he spent time with in the 1950s. The main character is based on this boy, although when the story was written, multiculturalism in children's books was not mainstream.

Two years later, "The Snowy Day," was published. This full-color pica child, one of his drawings spared him a confrontation with an older boy who was impressed by his work. The author called "Goggles!" a "triumph of brains over brawn."

Keats described his next book, "Apt. 3" (1971), as "closest to me in personal experience and one of the most important things I have ever done." This book, along with "Dreams" (1974), a mood piece, is based on his memories of tenement living.

By the end of his life in 1983, Keats had illustrated more than 85 books (and authored 22), most of them for children. His work expresses the hope, joy and beauty that exist even in an impoverished, dilapidated world. Keats' memories also helped to shape his view of humanity.

"If we could really see ('see' as perceive, understand, discover) each other exactly as the other is, this would be a different world," he said.

Indeed, Keats has influenced the way many see by sharing his inner world and talent with readers all over the globe.

"The Snowy Day and the Art of Ezra Jack Keats" at the Jewish Museum [1109 Fifth Ave. at 92nd Street in Manhattan, (212) 423-3200] is on display through Jan. 29. For more, visit thejewishmuseum.org.

ture book came out at the height of America's civil rights movement, and depicted an African-American boy named Peter enjoying the snow for the first time.

In 1962, picture books featuring minority children were still rare. Other than a few publications that were not widely distributed, African Americans were mostly represented in racist caricatures. Keats' gritty urban settings were also new to picture books.

Despite the overall groundbreaking success of "The Snowy Day," Keats' book also received criticism. In a 1965 essay in The Saturday Review, Nancy Larrick described Peter's mother as a stereotypical mammy and attacked Keats for not addressing Peter's race in the text. The author responded to Larrick's comments with a sarcastic remark at the end of his letter: "Might I suggest armbands?" Keats achieved his goal of representing a black character equally to a white one and did not feel the need to apologize for his work.

Overall, "The Snowy Day" was widely embraced by the public. Since its publication, it has been translated into 10 languages and has sold millions of copies. (A letter of praise from Langston Hughes is on display at the museum.) Every child, regardless of race, ethnicity or social background can relate to the character of Peter, and readers celebrated this.

Keats masterfully used his personal experiences to tell powerful stories through the use of simple language and rich, vivid illustrations inspired by haiku poetry and Asian art. In "Goggles!" (1969), Keats' first autobiographical book, he drew on his run-ins with bullies. When he was Between 1975 and 1981, Keats wrote a series of picture books with another African-American protagonist named Louie ("Louie," 1975; "The Trip," 1978; "Louie's Search," 1980; "Regards to the Man in the Moon," 1981). Louie struggles with feelings of isolation and invisibility — as did Keats early in his life. The four stories are modeled after Keats' own experiences, as well as significant people in his childhood. Despite the deep connection between Keats' life and work, his art transcends the personal and reflects the universal concerns of children.

ANGELICA SERADOVA

Finding your new mom confidence

Being a mom is supposed to come naturally, right? Maybe, but for me, the first couple of weeks as a new mom had me feeling like a freshman on the first day of high school. I felt lost, awkward and terrified that this tiny person depended solely on me for her survival. Wouldn't that terrify any new mom?

I remember my first outing with my daughter, Olivia. She had her first pediatrician appointment about a week after she was born, and it was the first time I had left the house with her. Saying that I was a nervous wreck is an understatement. I couldn't remember the last time I felt so apprehensive.

To help calm my "first-day jitters," I gave myself three hours to prepare. A simple 15-minute drive had now become a production of epic proportions. I had to prepare the baby bag, dress myself and dress an infant. This was a huge task. I've always been a bit anxious, but on this occasion, leaving the house was about to give me a major meltdown.

Then I started the dreaded "What If" game. What if I drop her going down the stairs? What if I forget something? What if we get into a car accident? All these thoughts flooded my mind and made me doubt myself as a mother. This must be normal, I thought to myself. It has to get easier. But all I could do was worry.

Pulling up to the doctor's office in one piece was a relief and also felt like a huge accomplishment. Arriving to the doctor unscathed: check!

But just as I celebrated our milestone, something happened that made me doubt myself again. As I sat in the waiting room and prayed that my little one wouldn't start crying, I noticed that I was sitting next to an obviously well-controlled Super Mom. I wondered if I could ever be like her, and felt like such an amateur sitting next to her.

As I fantasized about ever having my own Super Mom qualities, I realized she was once in my shoes — a clueless new mom who slowly learned how to care for a baby and finally got it together. Just like everything else in life, I'm sure parenting takes practice. Besides, I must be doing something right. Olivia and I made it through her first doctor's appointment and more importantly, she got a clean bill of health.

When I look back at those first few weeks as a new mom, I feel like a completely different person. Nowadays, it doesn't take so much of a production to get out of the house. I know what to pack, try to prepare as much as I can the night before, and can manage to get both me and my daughter ready and out of the house in a decent amount of time. I don't get as flustered as I did in the beginning. Thankfully, Olivia and I have celebrated plenty of milestones together, no matter how small, because not only is she learning and developing, but I am, too. And with each milestone we achieve, comes a boost of motherly confidence.

Learning from Asian-Americans

What can be learned from immigrant families about being better students — and educators

BY ALLISON PLITT

Asians have moved to the U.S. to own homes, enroll in American schools, and take jobs in the U.S. work force, and their presence is quiet and understated, yet competitive and high achieving. At impressively high rates, Asian students are entering gifted and talented classes in elementary schools and advanced placement classes in high schools. Many go on to attend Ivy League universities, receive advanced degrees, and easily find work at international companies that rely upon Asia for manufacturing needs, purchasing power and lending credit.

Clearly, Asian-Americans have a lot to be proud of and their fellow Americans — especially parents and educators — should take the time to get to know them and learn what they're doing right when it comes to the educational arena.

In 2009, students from 65 countries participated in an international standardized test for reading, math and science given by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. Called the "Programme for International Student Assessment," the exam is given every three years to 15-year-olds in the leading industrialized nations to evaluate the knowledge they have acquired throughout their schooling.

When the test results were announced in December 2010, U.S. educators were shocked at the findings — students in Shanghai had the highest scores in all three categories, while the United States placed 17th in reading, 31st in math and 23rd in science.

Despite the high academic marks from Chinese schools and the robust economy in China, more Asians than ever are coming to the United States to live, study and work. As indicated by data from the 2010 U.S. census, Asians are the ethnic group with the largest population increase in the U.S. within the past decade. From 2000 to 2010, the population of Asians (which includes more than 20 different countries, including China, Japan, Korea, India, Pakistan and the Philippines) has grown 43.3 percent in the U.S. and now comprises 4.8 percent of the country's population.

One such Chinese immigrant is 29-year-old Ming, who was born, raised and educated in Shanghai. Brought up by parents who believed education would open doors to her future, Ming respects the values her family instilled in her.

"Because we were not very wealthy, I was told by my parents, 'Don't ever compete with others [over] shoes, the digital gadgets, the beautiful hair or whatever. Compare with that person your test score. Which college would you go to? Like, who laughs in the end?'"

Although her parents ingrained in Ming a competitiveness that gave her "that fire and desire," she doesn't regret the impact this mentality has had on her life.

"It can be very devastating for kids, but also it's very practical. It teaches us how to be competitive in the future in the work force," she said matter-of-factly. "If you look at the work force nowadays, Asians and Chinese are doing very well, and the reason they are doing very well is because they are very educated — most of them."

Ming moved to the U.S. two years ago with her American husband. At the time, she was teaching Chinese at an international school in Shanghai that was run by Americans. Although Ming and her husband both had good jobs there, they ultimately decided to move to New York City at the urging of her husband's family, who missed their only son. She is now a teacher at a New York City private school

Mastery of test-taking skills

Since Ming has been a teacher and student in China and the U.S., she is familiar with the educational systems in both countries. According to Ming, Chinese students are well-versed in test taking, as it is what they have been taught to do since elementary school. She attributes Shanghai's high 2009 test scores to the Chinese educational focus on standardized tests.

In the U.S., however, there has been a recent backlash toward standardized testing after, in 2001, Congress passed the "No Child Left Behind Act," which requires all public schools to administer state-wide standardized tests. If the test scores are low at a particular school, it receives less federal funding than a higher-performing school. Consequently, many U.S. teachers and school administrators now feel they spend so much time preparing their students to take this test, there is less classroom time for students to engage in more creatively stimulating tasks.

"Taking [a standardized] test is a skill. It doesn't really necessarily test how smart you are, how innovative you are," Ming remarked. "It's a lot about your skills. Could you sit there for half an hour or concentrate for half an hour taking that test? We started getting that discipline when we were very young."

Ming believes so strongly in her current students' ability to pass standardized tests that she is now teaching a club at her school called "Test Prep."

"Many times, it's not really about the content," she noted. "I think if you give any American kid extra time, they can finish it. They can do a very good job, but they just can't do it in a testing setting — like in a classroom — quiet, taking the test by yourself, independent. [American students] just can't do that."

Within the past five years in New York City, there has been a proliferation of tutoring centers for math, reading and writing, such as E.nopi and Kumon, which are based on the Asian philosophy of repetitive exercise until a student achieves a perfect score and can advance to the next level.

Although E.nopi is a Korean company and Kumon is Japanese, Ming sees both instructional approaches as "very Chinese. It's just repetitive. You just do that within five minutes, within 10 minutes, just again, again,

Focus on Asia

again, again. Just, practice makes perfect. It's based on that philosophy."

Respectful behavior in classroom

Ming, who is currently enrolled in a master's degree program in bilingual education, said that the main topic discussed in her classes is classroom management, which she believes is the most apparent difference between Chinese and American schools.

"We have to discourage [American students] from moving too much, and we have to sort of let them know that 'this is a class. We're not going to be talking about something that has nothing to do with what we're talking about,'" Ming said. "So I always tell the students like, 'You know, in China we have 70 kids or 60 kids in one class, and no one would talk back to an adult, let alone a teacher, just someone who is older than them.'"

While Ming thinks the U.S. students are too restless and outspoken in the classroom, she also feels that Chinese students are too reserved.

"Like, our side is too quiet. We have to encourage [the Chinese students] to answer questions, encourage them to be active, be moving around."

As an educator, Ming is always trying to find a compromise between Western and Eastern teaching philosophies.

"I feel like both are a little to the extremes," she reflected. "Like the Asians are always doing homework. [The Americans are] always on play-date. They should just come to the middle. The kids would benefit from it."

Ming ascribes the difference in the students' attitude to the level of respect teachers receive in China.

"In China, teachers make the same [amount of money] as a brain surgeon. We have the highest social status. We're the top of the food chain. Parents, faculty — everyone — respects you, because you're the educator. The same in Korea, the same in Japan, the same in many Asian countries."

On the other hand, Ming thinks Americans view teaching as a second option to other professions.

"I feel like, here, it's sort of like, 'I don't want to do other jobs.' I mean, for sure there are a lot of amazing, good teachers. There are so many, but I don't feel [U.S. teachers] are being respected by the society, and the unfortunate part of it is, parents don't show that respect, so they pass that to the kids," Ming stated. "When

Her parents told her, "Don't ever compete with others over shoes, the digital gadgets, the beautiful hair or whatever. Compare with that person your test score. Which college would you go to? Like, who laughs in the end?"

any student doesn't respect his teacher, how could they respect the content the teacher is teaching?"

Ming credits the respect teachers receive in China to their "very hierarch[ical] type of society."

"As long as that person is older, you need to show the respect... you should not be challenging that person even though, probably, you know whatever he's saying is wrong or is not truthful. You should find a private moment, not challenge him or her in public."

Importance of assertiveness

This tendency for Asians to be reticent and withholding in public has proved difficult for them in America, where citizens are more openly outspoken about their views. Ming describes the Chinese as being "not very confrontational," and when they are placed in compromising situations, she says they tend to internalize their feelings, instead of vocalizing them. When others recognize that Asians are less apt to express their grievances, Asians sometimes find themselves being taken advantage of.

For example, at the international school in Shanghai where Ming taught, the American administrators paid the French and Spanish teachers more than the Chinese teachers. Ming spoke of another instance when a Chinese teacher in the U.S. was given more work than her non-Asian co-workers, because her boss told her she was "highly qualified."

Why immigration boom

Ming thinks there are three motivating factors for Chinese to immigrate to the United States, despite the booming economy back home. First, she thinks the Chinese have always felt themselves "inferior" to Americans and Europeans after many years of lagging behind the economies and technologies of the Westernized world.

Second, Ming says many Chinese are still very poor and have a glamorized view of the United States.

"Because of all these penetrating shows, movies, celebrities, beautiful people, it gives the poor country back in China this false image like, 'everything there is better than us. Health care is better than us. Education is better than us,' instead of thinking, 'maybe it's not for everyone.'"

Lastly, Ming thinks that the majority of the Chinese who immigrate to the United States are wealthy and view the United States as a place where they can safely put their money into banks without the fear that the communist Chinese government will take it away from them.

Noticing that many of these Chinese immigrants frequently return to China to visit their families, Ming thinks they don't see the U.S. as a "home," but simply a place to secure their assets and educate their children.

For her part, Ming wants to one day feel like she can call the U.S. her "home," yet there are times when she, as an Asian immigrant, senses she is being excluded from the culture around her.

"I want to be more included. I notice in many work places or schools, you tend to see Asian kids together, you tend to see Chinese kids together, Chinese co-workers together," observed Ming. "For example, like the [American] co-workers, when they're having lunch, they close the door. Maybe they have four or five in there, and they would never say, 'You want to come and join us?' And we're not going to knock on the door, because you already closed the door."

Room for art

The benefits of letting kids decorate their spaces

BY MARY TOMASULO-MARIANO

When my daughter Gabriella was 11 and a budding Picasso, I wanted to find something new to inspire her artistic talents. After much thinking and consideration, I hired a local muralist to create a tapestry of color in Gabriella's room.

Gabriella worked side by side with the patient and talented artist, and was left with both a solid love for the arts and a room with quite a view. It took three days and a few cans of paint to complete the masterpiece, but together, they transformed a dull, beige wall into a beautiful window sill garden.

"Creating a mural was an interesting experience," Gabriella, now 22, recalls, smiling. "It was so empowering to work with a professional artist while only in middle school. It was exciting, and the end result gave the room much more personality."

Her room, which is now shared by her two teenage sisters, became happily alive with the new artwork. She even added her hand prints to the wall as her signature.

Looking back on the experience, Gabriella's advice to other budding artists is to pick a theme, and let your imagination run wild. In her case, she used the lamp on her wall as a focal point, and created a cascade of flowers around it. The window scene added a vivid landscape of color and brightness to an otherwise plain wall.

"It's important to give children a world of their own to experience a retreat from everything else," Gabriella says. "My room has always been a reflection of my personality. This artistic freedom has given me confidence, independence, and a sense of pride." Her siblings share this philosophy and add that, "Decorating is self-expression."

More recently, my teenage daughters have experimented with chalkboard paint in their rooms. This special paint allows you to write on the walls with chalk and clean by just dampening it. For Christiana and Angelica, the walls have become message centers, and when friends come over, they write and doodle on the chalkboard. My 9-year-old daughter Jacqueline and her friends play tic-tac-toe on her walls.

In addition to, or instead of, painting a room, you could try adding bulletin boards. Sometimes a fresh coat of paint is all you need. Many local home stores offer workshops with decoration tips and projects to bring out anyone's inner creativity.

"Furniture can be moved around if you get bored," says Gabriella, who feels that children's rooms are works in progress. "The room should grow and evolve with your child as they grow and evolve. It should be a favorite place to wind down from a busy school day."

In just one weekend, you can experience a room makeover. This fall, why not bring out the budding Picasso in your family and transform her room into a winter hideout? A few colors, brushes, and a bit of imagination can bring a springtime garden to your bedroom, too! And, like Gabriella and I, years later, you can recall the sense of accomplishment that your child experienced.

THE BOOK WORM

TERRI SCHLICHENMEYER

Book captures tween angst

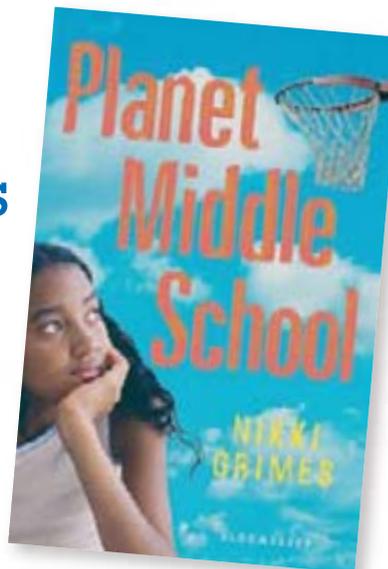

Imagine that you are 12 years old, and aliens have kidnapped your best friend.

At least that's what it seems like. The two of you used to do things together all the time. You'd hang out, watch TV, shoot hoops, or climb trees. You liked the same activities, and you knew each other's secrets.

But now, sometimes, you feel like you barely know her any more. She never wants to do the things you used to do and everything's different. It's almost like your best friend got kidnapped and replaced with someone who just looks like her.

In the new book, "Planet Middle School," by Nikki Grimes, 12-year-old Joylin knows the feeling. Both of her best friends are acting weird.

Joylin really hates it when people call her a tomboy. But what else can be said? She dresses in navy, baggy jeans, she's got a killer jump shot, and she hates girly things. Her dad is secretly happy about it all. Her mother just rolls her eyes.

Although Joylin despises the tomboy moniker, she doesn't mind when her best friend KeeLee teases her about sports and her lack of fashion sense. They've been BFs since they were nine, and they've always done everything together...until middle school started.

When Joylin tried out for the basketball team, KeeLee joined the school choir. They don't have the same classes very often. Sometimes, they don't sit together in the lunchroom any more, and that makes Joylin sad.

It makes her even sadder when KeeLee starts boy-watching.

And speaking of boys, even Jake, Joylin's best male friend, is acting weird now that they're all in middle school. He treats Joylin like a girl, instead of the way he used to when he didn't notice things like the bumps on her chest. And those bumps interfere with her jump shots, too!

Then a new boy, Santiago, shows up on the court one day. He smiles at Joylin and things change even more. How can she get Santiago to see her? Would a skirt and heels make him notice? Would make-up make a difference? And would Jake stop being such a jerk about this whole thing?

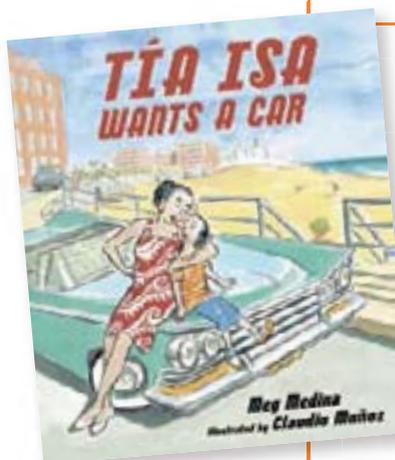

Why can't things just go back to the way they were?

Remember how hard it was to stand with one foot in childhood and one foot in "Grown-up Land?" Author Grimes brings all that confusion and those mixed feelings to life in this perfect little novel.

Using free-form story-poems of different lengths, Grimes gives voice to a smart, young character who is also wise beyond her years.

There's no reason a boy can't read this book, but I think 11-14-year-old girls will think "Planet Middle School" is out of this world.

"Planet Middle School" by Nikki Grimes [155 pages, Bloomsbury Kids, 2011, $15.99] is recommended for girls ages 11-14.

Teach kids how to save

The other day, while your child was playing outside, he found something small on the ground. It wasn't much, just a penny.

There's not a lot he can do with a penny anymore. It's not enough to buy candy or gum, and it takes bunches of them to buy a toy. Even more for a new video game.

But his Abuelita (Spanish for "Grandmother") always says he should save his money for a rainy day, and since a penny is money, he puts it away. (He has always wondered what rain has to do with anything, but, oh, well.)

In the new book, "Tía Isa Wants a Car," by Meg Medina, illustrated by Claudio Muñoz, a little girl learns that her pennies can take her anywhere, no matter what the weather.

More than anything, her aunt, Tía Isa, wants a car.

She says so after work, when she gets home from the bakery. It should be a green car, the color of foamy water on the beach. That color would remind Tía Isa of the ocean that lapped outside her bedroom window when she was a little girl. Maybe she should get a car with wings in the back, like sea gulls.

But Tío ("Uncle") Andrés laughs at her. The family's not rich, he reminds her. Besides, she's got more to worry about, like cooking dinner for him. Tía Isa tries to ignore him, but she knows that cars are expensive and that most of her money must be sent back home to Mami and Papi.

Yet, Tía Isa wants a car and her mind's made up. She speaks to the man who sells cars, but he tells her that she doesn't have enough cash. She says they'll have some soon, but "soon" can take forever.

Still, there are always other ways. Señor Leo might have a few odd jobs he'd pay to finish. La vieja ("elderly") Maria might need someone to help feed her windowsill cats. Miss Amy at la biblioteca ("the library") has been asking for español ("Spanish") lessons.

Tía Isa wants a car, but she's getting sad. Why does saving money take so long? Will she ever have enough to "vamos" on her own four wheels?

She might — with just a little help.

Like most of us, kids enjoy getting new possessions. And, like many of us, they have a hard time saving up for a big want. What they'll see in this book just might inspire them.

"Tía Isa Wants a Car" tells the cute story of doing something difficult to make a dream come true, even though it takes a long time. I loved the way Medina gives her little heroine a can-do attitude in helping her Tía, along with the satisfaction of seeing her efforts make a difference. Muñoz's illustrations are wonderfully expressive, further allowing the love between Tía and her niece to shine through.

Little spendthrifts, ages 3 to 7, will want to save time to hear this story read aloud. For them, "Tía Isa Wants a Car" is a good book, rain or shine.

"Tía Isa Wants a Car" by Meg Medina, illustrated by Claudio Muñoz [32 pages, Candlewick Press, 2011, $15.99] is recommended for children ages 3-7.

Terri Schlichenmeyer has been reading since she was 3 years old, and she never goes anywhere without a book. She lives on a hill with two dogs and 12,000 books.

Medical mistakes busy moms make

No matter your schedule, you can't forget to look after yourself

BY SANDRA GORDON

Every day, you make dozens of decisions about your health that can impact your wellbeing, such as whether to tough out the flu or see the doctor; go for a power walk after work, or watch TV instead; take a medicine or skip it. You do the best you can.

But, let's face it — you're juggling your own responsibilities along with your kid's health, school stuff, home life, employment, and sports activities. And your husband and your parents are probably in the mix, too. With so much going on, it's easy to get distracted and make micro- and macro-judgment calls about your own healthcare that can do more harm than help.

Where do you go wrong? Here are some of the biggest medical mistakes multitasking women (that's you) make — that doctors wish they wouldn't — and what you can do to remedy the situation.

Medical mishap: You've got an OB/GYN, but not a primary care doctor

If you have a gynecologist, but not a primary care doctor, it's time to go doctor shopping.

"Women should have both an ob/gyn and a PCP [Primary Care Physician]," says Michael Roizen, MD, division chair at the Cleveland Clinic and co-author of "You: The Smart Patient."

Primary care doctors have broad-based medical knowledge and training in the prevention area.

"There are so many nuances in drug therapy and drug interactions that PCPs are expert in," Roizen says. If your blood pressure is creeping up, for example, your gynecologist shouldn't be the one to write a prescription for blood pressure medication.

You'll also need a primary care doctor to make sure you undergo age-appropriate screening tests. And if you should need a specialist, a primary care doctor is invaluable for coordinating your care.

To-do tactic: To choose a primary care doctor, interview two or three until you find one you're compatible with. Clues a doctor is right for you: The waiting room has patients similar to your age, and the doctor isn't near retirement (a sign that she won't be able to care for you long-term). She's also up-to-date on what's likely to happen to you.

"If you have a family history of heart disease, for example, you want a physician who focuses on heart disease prevention," Roizen says.

Medical mishap: You take your kids to check-ups like clockwork, but you haven't seen a physician in years

Sure, your kids come first. But you need regular check-ups, too, even if you feel fine. If you don't have your blood pressure, cholesterol, and blood glucose tested regularly — preferably every five years if you're in your 20s and 30s and otherwise healthy, and yearly after that — you don't know if you're at risk for a major condition such as diabetes, heart attack or stroke.

"Denial can be deadly," says Nieca Goldberg, MD, a cardiologist and medical director at the NYU Women's Heart Program in New York City.

To-do tactic: Stay on top of your own health. Schedule a physical every five years if you're healthy and under 40, so you know where you're at in terms of blood pressure (goal: less than 120/80), total cholesterol (less than 200), LDL or "bad" cholesterol (less than 70 to 160, depending on your heart disease risk), HDL or "good" cholesterol (50 or higher for women), triglycerides (less than 150), fasting blood glucose (less than 100), body mass index (less than 25), and waist circumference (35 inches or less for women).

If you're over 40 or you're younger, but have a strong family history of cancer, heart disease, or diabetes, or have had an abnormal mammogram, a breast biopsy, a history of an abnormal Pap test, or a history of an ovarian cyst, get a well-adult checkup every year. Depending on your situation, you could start with your internist or your gynecologist.

Schedule your annual appointment near a memorable date — such as your birthday — so you don't forget.

Medical mishap: You forget to get your prescription filled but go to your follow-up appointment anyway

"It's a waste of time to go to your follow-up appointment, if you haven't even taken your medication in the first place," says Margaret McKenzie, MD, a physician with the Cleveland Clinic Women's Health Institute. That's because the path to getting well is a process that often goes like this: You come in with symptoms; your doctor writes a prescription; and you take the medication until your next appointment, at which point, your doctor assesses if the medication is working and whether you're getting better. If you don't get your prescription filled, you will still be at square one. Your symptoms will linger, your condition could worsen, and your doctor won't have any new information to fine-tune your treatment plan.

To-do tactic: When you get a prescription, get to the pharmacy right away instead of letting it slide.

"Put 'fill prescription' at the top of your to-do list," says McKenzie, who takes her own advice. "I write everything down. If it isn't written down, it isn't happening." Then, take the medication as directed before going to your follow-up doctor's visit.

Medical mishap: You poo-poo your symptoms or wait until the last minute to mention them

Symptoms related to incontinence or sexuality, such as urine leakage or pain during intercourse or a decreased sex drive, are the big ones that patients often fail to bring up during medical appointments unless the doctor asks.

"Or, they'll mention these or other symptoms as they're walking out the door of my office, and then a whole new visit starts," says McKenzie. Embarrassment is part of it, but again, so is just being busy. "Women are multitasking so much that in the whirlwind of just getting to my office, they forget about their symptoms," she says.

To-do tactic: To make the most of your next doctor's visit, prepare by making a list of troublesome signs and symptoms, and bring them up yourself, no matter how embarrassing or minor you think they are. If you're uncomfortable mentioning them, practice saying them out loud at home or in the car on the drive over, as in "I feel pain when I pee," "I leak when I laugh," or "My periods last forever." When the doctor asks the reason for your visit, put it out there, so you don't miss an opportunity to get treatment.

Medical mishap: You don't hear back about test results, so you just assume they're normal

No news isn't necessarily good news. Doctors are especially pressed for time these days, so things can fall through the cracks.

To-do tactic: Don't let your doctor drop the ball. After you've taken medical tests and don't hear from your doctor's office when you thought you would, it's your responsibility to call the doctor or the doctor's nurse to follow-up.

"Just like in school, you've taken the test, so you deserve to get the grade to see how well you've done," says Dawn Calderon, DO, FACC, a cardiologist and director of the Women's Wellness Program at Deborah Heart and Lung Center in Browns Mills, NJ.

What's a reasonable length of time to wait? For a Pap test, allow a month for turnover for lab results. For blood tests and X-rays, give it three days before dialing your doctor or your doctor's nurse.

"You're not bugging the doctor," says McKenzie. "You're helping her to stay on task and on time. Healthcare is a partnership."

Sandra Gordon is the mom of two in Weston, CT. She writes about health and nutrition for major magazines, websites and books. For more about her, visit www.sandrajgordon.com.

Past meets present

The New York Historical Society opens a children's museum

BY TAMMY SCILEPPI

New York City is a fascinating place with a rich history. To start your child on the path to learning about his hometown, there's no better spot than the newly renovated New-York Historical Society's mini museum, the DiMenna Children's History Museum, on Manhattan's Upper West Side.

In November, the groundbreaking museum opened its doors and welcomed curious young visitors and their families. The first ever of its kind, the museum provides a unique, multi-dimensional experience, aimed at kids ages 7 to 13. It's where youngsters can learn about history in a non-traditional, fun way.

It takes parents of younger children to come up with such an innovative concept. The museum is the brainchild of Diana DiMenna and her husband, Joseph, who have two little ones. They helped fund its construction. Their main goal: they didn't want kids thinking history was just about a bunch of old men.

Through interactive games, a virtual time machine, and a myriad of surprise adventures, kids who visit the museum — which is on the lower level of the New-York Historical Society — can find a connection with children who lived, played, and sometimes worked in New York City a couple of hundred years ago, or more. Here, kids' imaginations can soar as they enter and explore an amazing new world like no other.

"We have seen grown-ups and children 'digging' into the exhibition together. Some are longtime fans of the Historical Society who are happy to have a place to go for their children to learn about history, and some are first-time visitors looking for a new experience," said Alice Stevenson, director of the museum. "Overall, they really appreciate the hands-on design of the museum — it keeps children of different ages and interests engaged, and brings the past to life."

As visitors enter the museum, they immediately get a sense — thanks to bright graphics — that this is a child- and family-friendly place. The characters on the stairs will lead you back through time — beginning in the Great Hall with recent history, passing such well-known New Yorkers as Arthur Ashe and the Marx

Brothers — and ending at the base of the stairs in a recreated environment devoted to the Lenape people, who lived in the New York area before Europeans arrived.

Families are then welcomed by a dramatic but fanciful recreation of the New-York Historical Society's new façade, linking this experience to the Historical Society as a whole.

The History Detectives kiosk introduces questions that visitors may never have considered, or may have answered for themselves in a very limited way: How do historians work? How do they draw meaning from the surviving remnants of earlier times? How do we know what we know about the past? This prepares kids and their families to think about the characters they'll encounter in the museum.

For instance, at the Historical Viewfinder kiosk, visitors can compare current images of neighborhoods in the five boroughs with photographs from the past, and can experience being a part of history at the American Dreamers kiosk, where photographs of New Yorkers from the past and present flash by with their names, birthdates and occupations. Kids can then take their own photos and add what they wish to be when they grow up. Their picture will then join the photo stream, where they can see themselves as part of the narrative of history. That's pretty powerful stuff!

Your child might ask, "What does it feel like to participate in a democracy?" Future voters can check out the Cast Your Vote and First President pavilions, and find out how voting rights have changed over time; they may also wish to recite the presidential oath of office. (You never know.)

When your kids experience the narrative pavilions, they'll surely begin to wonder if there are similarities between their everyday lives and those of kids from long ago. The pavilions delve into interesting backgrounds of historical figures, like Alexander Hamilton, who came here from the Caribbean as an orphan around 1700, and who would become the Secretary of the Treasury; a Dutch girl, Cornelia van Varick, who was the daughter of a 17th century textile worker. Her wooden linen chest is an antique treasure trove of artifacts she collected during her childhood, and kids can sift through her stuff to get a sense of how life was during that period of time.

Then there's James McCune Smith, who became an abolitionist and America's first African-American doctor; Esteban Bellán, a Cuban immigrant, who grew up to become the first Latino to play pro baseball; and what was it like to be a child on the Orphan Train?

What did these children wear? How did they learn? What might life have been like for the newsies, kids who sold newspapers for a penny on city street corners? Why didn't they go to school? Why were they allowed to work?

"In particular, Orphan Train riders and newsies have had a real resonance with visitors," Stevenson said. "At the end of their visit, when we have asked children 'which was your favorite?' inevitably, it is one of those two pavilions, and the students can recount the stories with great detail. The idea of childhood throughout the centuries has really emerged as a dominant theme for our visitors."

Finally, at the adjacent Barbara K. Lipman Children's Library, children can explore the printed world of New York. Digital images of four rare texts — "Sander's Pictorial Primer," "The Story of Dam Trot and her Comical Cat," the "New York Gazette & Weekly Mercury" newspaper, and the "Hieroglyphic Mother Goose" — are on display, as well as an interactive atlas, maps of old New York, books, and drawers full of artifacts. Plus, every Sunday at 11:30 am, the Lipman Library hosts a free story hour, where kids can hear the stories of New York.

Don't miss this special adventure that takes place on the lower level of the New-York Historical Society.

DiMenna Children's History Museum at New-York Historical Society [170 Central Park West at 77th Street in Manhattan, (212) 873-3400]. Open Tuesday through Thursday and Saturday, 10 am-6 pm; Friday 10 am-8 pm; Sunday 11 am-5 pm, closed Monday. Adults, $15; seniors and educators, $12; students, $10; kids (7-13) $5; children under 7, free. Admission is pay-as-you-wish on Fridays, from 6 to 8 pm. GOOD SENSE EATING

CHRISTINE M. PALUMBO, RD

Sugar overload?

“Honey.” “Sweetie.” “Sugar.” They’re all terms of endearment for the people we love. Yet, when it comes time to eat, we feel guilty about serving sweets.

If it seems that children eat a lot of sugar, they do. They slurp it in soft drinks and sweetened fruit drinks and gobble it in yogurts, candy, cookies and commercial smoothies.

But, surprisingly, consumption of added sugars is decreasing for people age 2 and older, according to data published in the September 2011 issue of the American Journal of Clinical Nutrition. Why? It’s mainly because we’re drinking less soda. The sugars in energy drinks, however, are increasing.

Why do kids crave sweets?

It’s for the survival of the species! If you nursed a baby, did you ever taste your milk? It is sweet. Mother Nature created baby’s first food to taste wonderful to ensure baby would like it and thrive. Also, naturally occurring sweet foods, such as berries, grapes, apples, plums and other fruit, are rich in nutrients.

Finally, it may be a combination of learned desire for sweets and a genetic predisposition, according to New York City-based dietitian

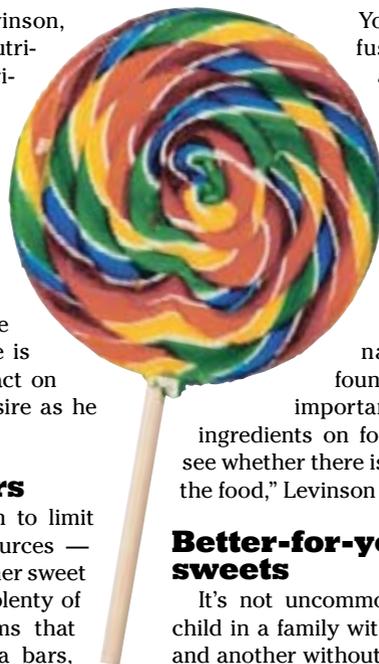

Jessica Fishman Levinson, MS, RD, founder of Nutritious, www.nutritious.com.

“Some studies have shown a genetic predisposition for sweets based on the mother’s diet while the baby is in utero. However, what a child is fed and the food he is exposed to once he is born has a large impact on the flavors he will desire as he gets older.”

Sneaky sugars

Parents know when to limit the obvious sugar sources — candy, cookies and other sweet treats. But there are plenty of so-called healthy items that contain sugar: granola bars, sports drinks, ketchup, salad dressings, cereals, pasta sauce, tomato soup and smoothies.

Here’s a tip on how to determine the amount of sugar in a food or drink. Take the amount of sugar in grams, divide by four, and you have the number of teaspoons of sugar in a serving. Then, be sure to multiply the serving size by the number of servings your child actually consumes.

You may be confused by the amount of sugar listed on a label. For example, it may seem that a cup of milk is high in sugar because it has 12 grams.

“That is the natural sugar found in milk. It’s important to read the ingredients on food packages to see whether there is added sugar in the food,” Levinson says.

Better-for-you sweets

It’s not uncommon to have one child in a family with a sweet tooth and another without. How to handle the one with the sweet tooth? Try fruit.

“Fruit is a naturally sweet food and most children don’t get enough servings of fruit per day, so it’s a great option when kids want a sweet snack,” recommends Levinson, whose new recipe book for children is “We Can Cook.”

But for those whose day simply isn’t complete without a sweet treat?

“There is nothing wrong with children having sweetened foods like cookies or cake in moderation. The key is watching how much a child is having and limiting the ‘treats’ to a small portion no more than once a day,” she says.

Finally, a little honey or real maple syrup can offer sweetness with a bit of nutrition. Both have small amounts of naturally occurring antioxidants. In fact, a study reported at the 2011 American Chemical Society meeting found polyphenols in maple syrup.

Keep in mind that any sugar should be brushed away (or rinsed if a toothbrush is not available) to reduce risk of caries.

Baked apples

Apple pie, apple crisp, apple tart — all these desserts are delicious, but they are definitely special-occasion treats. Not so with baked apples, which still have the same warm, delicious flavors, and are a great way to fit a fruit serving into your child’s daily intake.

Makes four servings

INGREDIENTS

- 4 cooking apples
- ½ lemon
- 2 tbsp brown sugar
- ½ tsp cinnamon
- ½ cup water
- 1 tbsp maple syrup

DIRECTIONS: Preheat the oven to 350 degrees. Peel the top of the apples, and show your child how to core them using an apple corer (or use a paring knife to remove the stem area, and use a spoon to remove the rest of the core). Make sure to leave the bottom intact.

Have your child rub the lemon on the tops of the apples where they were peeled. She can also squeeze some juice in the core area that is now empty.

In a small bowl, she can then combine the brown sugar and cinnamon, and spoon equal amounts of the mixture into each of the apples.

Pour water into the baking pan and place the apples in the pan. Let your child drizzle the syrup over all of the apples.

Cover with aluminum foil and bake for about 50 minutes.

Keeping the peace

Queens teens' Model UN experience becomes a documentary

BY KRISTINA JOSEPH, SHERLANA ROOPLAL AND SYMONE SIMON

Sixteen Model United Nations students from John Adams High School got the thrill of a lifetime when they were chosen to be in a documentary produced by National Geographic.

The students in Michael Budhu's role-playing class — which simulates the work of the United Nations, while honing the students' public speaking and research skills — were picked out of 140 schools from around the world to appear in the film "Decorum: A Model UN Documentary Series." The students represented Sudan, Guatemala and India during the May Model UN conference at the Grand Hyatt Hotel in Manhattan where the documentary was filmed.

On Oct. 5, the students from the Queens school returned to the hotel to attend a screening of the film. They were greeted by hotel representatives, reporters, and the director of the film, Matthew Bardocz. They were also informed that the documentary would be shown on the Times Square Jumbotron, as well as on the small screens inside taxis for the following three weeks.

More rewarding than their 15 minutes of fame, however, was the students' sense of pride.

"I felt important. I felt as if people out there wanted to hear from us. It's wonderful knowing that we come from a local school here in Queens, and now, so many people outside of our own community can become aware of all of the hard work that we put in," said Model UN student Anil Drepaul, 17, who was interviewed in the documentary.

Megan Aguirre, 17, another student appearing in the film, said she gained much more out of the experience than she expected to.

"From the conference, I was able to demonstrate the ability to stand up and speak my mind. I used to be scared of what people thought about me and what I had to say. But the conference boosted my confidence, and it gave me a sense of what life will really be like as I get older. I now feel so much more comfortable to express my thoughts."

Student Ayah Innab, 15, who earned an "Honorable Mention" award during the May conference, agreed.

"I was ecstatic and surprised. I felt that there was such a high level of competition. This was, indeed, a significant accomplishment."

When the students returned to the school after viewing the documentary, they were pleasantly surprised to find that numerous teachers were showing their students the video clips of the "Decorum" stars; in fact, many of the Model UN students said they were approached by teachers and students who complimented and applauded them.

"It's a great tribute to them. It shows that students can do anything, if they put their minds to it," Principal Grace Zwillenberg said of the students. "They have gained important skills in life that they can keep and build on when they enter into college."

To watch the first three episodes of the documentary, visit the website of the United Nations Association of the United States of America, www.unausa.org/decorum.

The class had a great time when they went to the Model UN Conference last May.

A TEEN'S TAKE

AGLAIA HO

My first date with Facebook

Social networking sites have become a phenomenon with teens since websites like Facebook came online — and having a presence on them has become a must for most teenagers. Well, except me. Until now.

I recently got my Facebook account — after choosing not to have ents, and together we decided that if I used good judgment, Facebook would help me stay in the loop.

I created my account, and because I was just about the last person in my school to be on Facebook, the deluge began.

I was bombarded with friend requests. As I scanned the page, I noticed that half of the people were mere acquaintances. Some were just kids who went to my school, though we shared none of the same classes. One of my friends even teased, “OMG, you actually exist!”

To add to my headache, many people were hiding behind various pseudonyms and monikers (obviously, “Harvard Lightning” and “CeeJ” aren’t actual names). The anonymity of identities give teenagers the liberty to fantasize about the perfect person. Still, it is particularly confusing — and dangerous.

Screening through friend requests was time-consuming. After an hour, I was still filtering requests. Much care is needed in order to connect with the right people, not those with villainous motives.

If I thought “friending” people was rocket science, I was faced with a whole new challenge when I began to explore the site further. All users have their own profile, which they can edit to express their likes, dislikes, and even personal information. As I skimmed the profiles of my friends, I learned that Facebook was like a sounding board. My friends continuously posted random quotes, complaints, and exclamations on their profile “wall.” Some were nearly as trivial as “[name] flop like a fish,” and “why am I the fish?” I couldn’t help but cringe at the pure stupidity of it.

Still, I found that Facebook had practical benefits, despite my initial shock. For one, the site allows students to discuss class lessons and homework. I found a group of students from my house with whom I could discuss math homework and the discussions were mostly productive. Rather than just posting the answer, some students explained the solutions.

Facebook also provides an outlet for students to collaborate on group projects. Passing around documents and discussing how to organize the work is much easier over the Internet. Messaging one another makes each exchange more informative and resourceful.

Facebook makes it much easier to plan events. I’ve learned that hosting large events is an arduous chore. Making individual phone calls leaves you without a voice, and mass e-mails often go unread. However, discussing details for a get-together is more convenient on Facebook. RVSPs are built into the system, so no one has to pull teeth to get a response. This is a great feature for teenagers, because getting out and about is a big part of our lives.

Overall, I would say that having self-control is the key to utilizing Facebook to its potential without sacrificing time and safety. Keep a private account free from personal information and connect with people you actually know. Join class groups to understand lessons and homework. Ignore any rude and pointless comments. And don’t be afraid to let your parent be involved in your online life.

Even after realizing the benefits of Facebook, I still believe that it is not the center of our lives! What’s wrong with face-to-face communication? Our society lacks many real-life experiences because technology is so deeply ingrained in our world. An instant message will never have the same emotional or memorable capacity as a direct conversation or even a handwritten letter. Real life is on the line, but not online!

Aglaia Ho is a 16-year-old student from Queens who enjoys writing. Her work has been published in Creative Kids, Skipping Stones, Daily News-Children’s Pressline, and The State of the Wild.

one for years — because it was the only way I could access one of my teacher’s notes that she began posting online. Still, my decision to do so wasn’t an easy one: I was well aware of the consequences of overuse. I have friends who are obsessed with updating their status. I also know friends who have been cyber-bullied. I didn’t want to become a victim of the social network.

So I talked it over with my par-

As our children head back to school, there is no time like the present to capitalize on the excitement of starting anew and getting a head start on their future.

This fall, we are pleased to offer the After-school Academy; a 10-week Monday to Friday program designed to help your child excel in school with homework assistance, positive reinforcement and other activities to help your child stay on top.

In addition to the After-school Academy, we also offer a College for Kids weekend program with a wide ranging curriculum for children of all ages. Improve their academic skills in reading and writing, mathematics and test preparation techniques, or simply discover a new talent in the arts such as music or dancing.

With our small class sizes and passionate instructors, your child will benefit from individual instruction as well as acquiring social skills and learning the values of teamwork as they interact with their classmates.

Putting the cool back into school, your child will have a positive and productive learning experience here at Hostos. Spend your weekday afternoons or Saturday mornings with us and see your child's potential blossom!

New & Noteworthy

Say cheese

Electronic gadgets are all the rage for adults, but that doesn't mean kids can't enjoy the digital revolution, too. And it's never been easier, or more fun, than with the new Fisher-Price Kid-Tough Digital Camera! This camera is built to withstand some serious roughhousing, and has a two-eye view to make it easier for children to peek through the viewfinder. It's got extra-big buttons for tiny fingertips, and dual-hand grips to keep the camera steady and focused while your amateur photographer explores her new hobby. Plus, it comes in a variety of colors, has a four-time zoom, and takes AAA batteries.

The power of three

There's nothing cooler than a set of wheels — even if you're 15 years shy of actually getting a driver's license. That's where the new Harley Davidson Motorcycles Lights and Sounds Trike comes in. Perfect for toddlers, ages 2-6, this heavy-metal tricycle sports real-life motorcycle sounds, flashing blinkers, rock 'n' roll music and walkie-talkie phrases. Your child will want to hit the open road in no time. And because this trike has easy-grip handlebars; slip-resistant pedals; a wide, stable wheel base; and oversized front wheel for faster pedaling, the experience of riding will be a smooth one for your tot, and a worry-free one for you!

New kid on the blocks

Alphabet blocks are an essential toy for any baby, whether yours is a newborn or a teetering toddler. These blocks, with letters and numbers applied on each side, encourage recognition of these characters — all while your child has a blast building structures of all shapes and sizes. But who says blocks have to be stiff, heavy and made of wood? Not Mary of Lovin' Ewe, an online boutique shop that sells hand-sewn, plush alphabet blocks that are made to order based on color, texture and pattern preferences. Each block is 4-inches by 4-inches, and includes one side coated in chenille, to make your baby's blocks extra soft.

Lovin' Ewe baby blocks, $5 per block up to first seven, then $3 for each additional block. To order, visit www.etsy.com/shop/LovinEweToo.

Whooo's got style?

A new mother wanted to decorate her daughter's nursery, and her goals were to make it an extra warm, loving and friendly place — so she decided to make her own stuffed animals to keep her new baby company.

enjoy these soft, beautiful toys. The creatures come in a wide array of colors and shapes, and because each is made specially to order, customers are encouraged to specify color schemes and patterns. There's no better

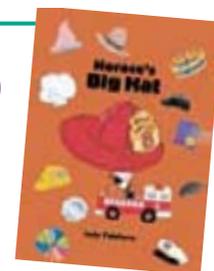

Lucky for you, she turned her expertly crafted and adorable stuffed woodland creatures — including owls, lovebirds, raccoons and other forest critters — into an online business so other moms and dads can

Dressing up

The hero of Judy Palaferro's latest book, "Horace's Big Hat" (Umbrage), actually wears many different hats. And each transports him — along with his imagination, of course — to a new, lavishly illustrated environment. While there are the hats you would expect — like a firefighter's helmet or chef's toque — Horace also sports a turban while riding a majestic elephant in India and an astronaut's helmet while floating in space. Parents can make story time more engaging for their 2- to 5-year-old tots by encouraging them to choose and learn the names of the many objects in these dense, vibrant pictures. Hats off to Palaferro for a fun read!

"Horace's Big Hat" by Judy Palaferro, $16.95. For info, visit www.umbragebooks.com.
